

I am in favor of Kelly that i disagree the saying "The early bird gets the worm."

First, being early always means proceeding without enough thought and planning, which is important particularly on stepping in a new field where we have little understanding. For instance, it is important to have a investigate of the preference of customers before we trying to sell some products on campus.

Besides, being early means we are taking more risks than general. Because we are the first one who step in this field, we have no prior experience, which may lead to confuse when we have various choices and when we are getting in trouble.
